

Special Operations Recruiter Liaison Duty

Introduction

The development and maintenance of our national defense structure requires a steady flow of highly qualified and motivated young men to perform highly demanding ground special operations jobs in the U.S. Air Force. As an Air Force Special Operations Recruiting Liaison (SORL), you will be responsible for ensuring we attract and recruit the quality and quantity of personnel these career fields demand.

SORL's act as a direct liaison from AFSOC to the recruiting Groups, Squadrons, and Flights. SORL's provide a multitude of subject matter expertise to the Air Force Recruiting Service (AFRS). SORLs support awareness campaigns, marketing events, testing support, and testing for qualified recruits.

As a SORL you will also act as a representative of the Air Force to the local community within which you serve. Public and civilian opinions of the Air Force will often be formed solely on your military appearance in uniform and the professionalism by which you carry out your assigned tasks. Additionally, you will be a role model and the first exposure to the Special Operations community to future Airman before they enter onto active duty. You will have the opportunity to shape our future enlisted force.

Special Operations Recruiter Liaison expectations

Because recruiting is a sales profession, the SORL must tailor daily activities to the availability of prospective applicants, community influencers and covering large geographical areas. This often requires irregular hours and multiple periods of Temporary Duty (TDY) away from home.

As a SORL, you will also be expected to interact with civic and community organizations, establish rapport with school officials and direct an effective school visitation plan. Other activities include participating in parades, special events, creating community awareness, and soliciting assistance from the local radio and television public service directors in promotion of Air Force events.
